
Will Tutoring Help My Child?

With students returning to school, many parents will look at last year's report cards and ask two questions: Does my child need tutoring? How do I know if the tutor will suit my child?

The answer to the first question is that students seek private tutoring for various reasons. Students obtaining above average results often attend private tutoring to improve upon those results.

Others may 'struggle' at school and are too shy to seek help in front of their peers. Tutoring provides the opportunity to ask questions in an individualised setting.

In some cases, time poor parents want a space where their child can complete homework, so that family time can be used for other pursuits.

Beyond academic improvement, positive tutoring experiences will often help a student build self-confidence, resilience and an enthusiasm for learning.

In finding a suitable tutor, a pre-tuition interview is the ideal opportunity to ask questions and determine if the tutor is right for your student. Topics for discussion could include:

- The structure of the tutoring program (including flexibility to adjust to student needs and the use of technology)
- The tutor's experience and qualifications
- Student-teacher ratios
- Fee structure and process if the student can't attend in a session. (Due to ongoing costs, many tutors will require payment, but offer a catch up lesson).
